The 'Something We Africans Got' project, named after the quarterly magazine launched by Anna-Alix Koffi dedicated to contemporary art and critical thought in Africa, aims to become an alternative space by focusing on digital and videographic art.

In this context, workshops and artist residencies for sharing experiences have been organized. Calls for projects have allowed populations to express themselves through digital arts, film clubs, and discussions. Collaborations with local, regional, and international institutions have been encouraged.

Furthermore, alongside a comprehensive digital marketing strategy, exhibitions accessible to all ages have been set up. Access to content is free for the local population. The goal is for this content to help the public understand an artwork and apply this learning to daily life, by structuring their thoughts and expressing them effectively.

Finally, women's entrepreneurship has been encouraged, and the cultural offering in Abidjan has been diversified and strengthened in the vibrant Blockauss neighborhood. This fosters a mix of populations through this creative space, aiming to establish Abidjan as a leading cultural hub on the continent.
